

Summer Hypothermia

It's summer. The hot sun is beating down and the mercury keeps creeping up, up, up. Chances are, hypothermia - the condition that occurs when the body's core temperature cools to dangerously low levels - is the furthest thing from your mind right now.

Though summer health warnings are most often about things like UV protection and preventing heat exhaustion or stroke, hypothermia is actually a legitimate summer-time concern. In fact, more people die from hypothermia during the summer each year than during the winter.

Most cases of hypothermia, during any season, occur when people are working outdoors. In the summertime, people often fall prey to hypothermia because they fail to dress appropriately and plan for changes in the weather. Wear lots of layers of clothing and keep extra clothing in a backpack. If your clothing gets wet, you can take out your extra clothing from your pack and replace the wet clothing. Bring high energy food with you and keep snacking. Food provides heat and replaces energy that you've lost.

Hypothermia comes on subtly, and can sometimes be difficult to recognize. When the body's core temperature drops below 95°, it begins reducing blood flow to the extremities in an effort to protect the vital organs. Mild hypothermia an individual may be shivering but is still alert and coherent. When someone has moderate hypothermia they will may be shivering but may abruptly stop and become irrational and experience lack of coordination. A person suffering from sever hypothermia may or may not shiver. Some victims may act combative and attempt to remove clothing and experience a feeling of warmth.
